The New Jersey Policy Institute, a 501(c)(3) nonprofit policy incubator that seeks to bring together policymakers, business leaders, nonprofits, lawmakers, elected officials, grassroots advocates and others to focus on meaningful policy solutions regarding the major issues facing Garden State families, launched Monday night at a kickoff forum in Hamburg.

Founder and President Rosemary Becchi, a former Republican congressional candidate, said the group will address numerous issues.

“New Jerseyans are facing significant burdens in their quality of life, on major issues ranging from taxes and energy to our schools and a broken transportation system,” she said. “Our state government’s lack of innovation and political polarization are resulting in the same status-quo outcomes year after year, on a number of chronic state issues. “Rather than being a think tank, NJPI plans to be a ‘do’ tank and drive policy changes through collaboration. This policy institute is designed to be an ideas incubator for new, bipartisan solutions to New Jersey’s complicated issues, ensuring a bright and prosperous future for the next generation of New Jerseyans.”
